

It's funny how we learn best by analogies and by stories. If we can grasp a concept by having it explained to us framed by a common situation, we tend to get it. Whatever "it" is.

Similarly, we tend to feel better when we can read case studies about other people, businesses and teams wrestling with a problem we seem to face daily.

You're in luck this month. Esther illustrates, through a case study, a hospital team who needed to get in-line with their values. Bill uses the car maintenance analogy for team maintenance.

Enjoy the learning.

Yours in team performance,

Bill & Esther.

---

Tools for Change

How effective is your team?

In just five minutes you'll understand the great parts that have your team working well. Helpful, particularly if you think your team is not well-aligned.

Click to start>>>

How we help

Team Plan Implementation

For a team to have a plan is one thing, implementing it successfully requires persistence and focus. The team creates a planning calendar and clearly states who will do what and when it will be done.

Click to learn more>>>

---

No one living the company values

Teams are sometimes baffled that they are not aligned. They agree on their values, yet no one is living them. Sound familiar? Find out what happened to a team with this very issue and had the added pressure of a funding grant being withheld if they didn't start to walk the talk.

Click to read more>>

---

Tune up every 90 days

Success is found through the repeated application of the right effort at the right time. Alignment means that team members are working effortlessly towards the goal of project success. Find out how a 90-day tune up can help this happen.

Click to read more>>

